October is a third the way through and we're on the edge of ticking over to 2013, though there are a couple of months to go. I've been busier than ever in the second half of 2012, though the first half wasn't that much different - I just remember more of the second half because it happened more recently.

What's been happening you ask? Well, lots. Skrambled Eggs happened - The third year that the smart phone photography exhibition featuring 12 experienced and professional photographers. I'm also working on branding and marketing for not only Benjamin Liew Photography, but another two other businesses which I am running in parallel to my normal business. More news on those two another time.

I've hung out with the Panda's at Adelaide Zoo while Simon Bryant cooked up a storm for a new corporate client of mine during a 3 day conference, I've had the privilege of photographing Jack Thompson at the State Library of South Australia, have ventured down to one of SA's famous wine regions - McLaren Vale to photograph a corporate event and I even spent a day photographing (and eating) chocolate made by Wendy at Four Winds Chocolate while Emma Kate Creative did all the awesome chocolate styling.

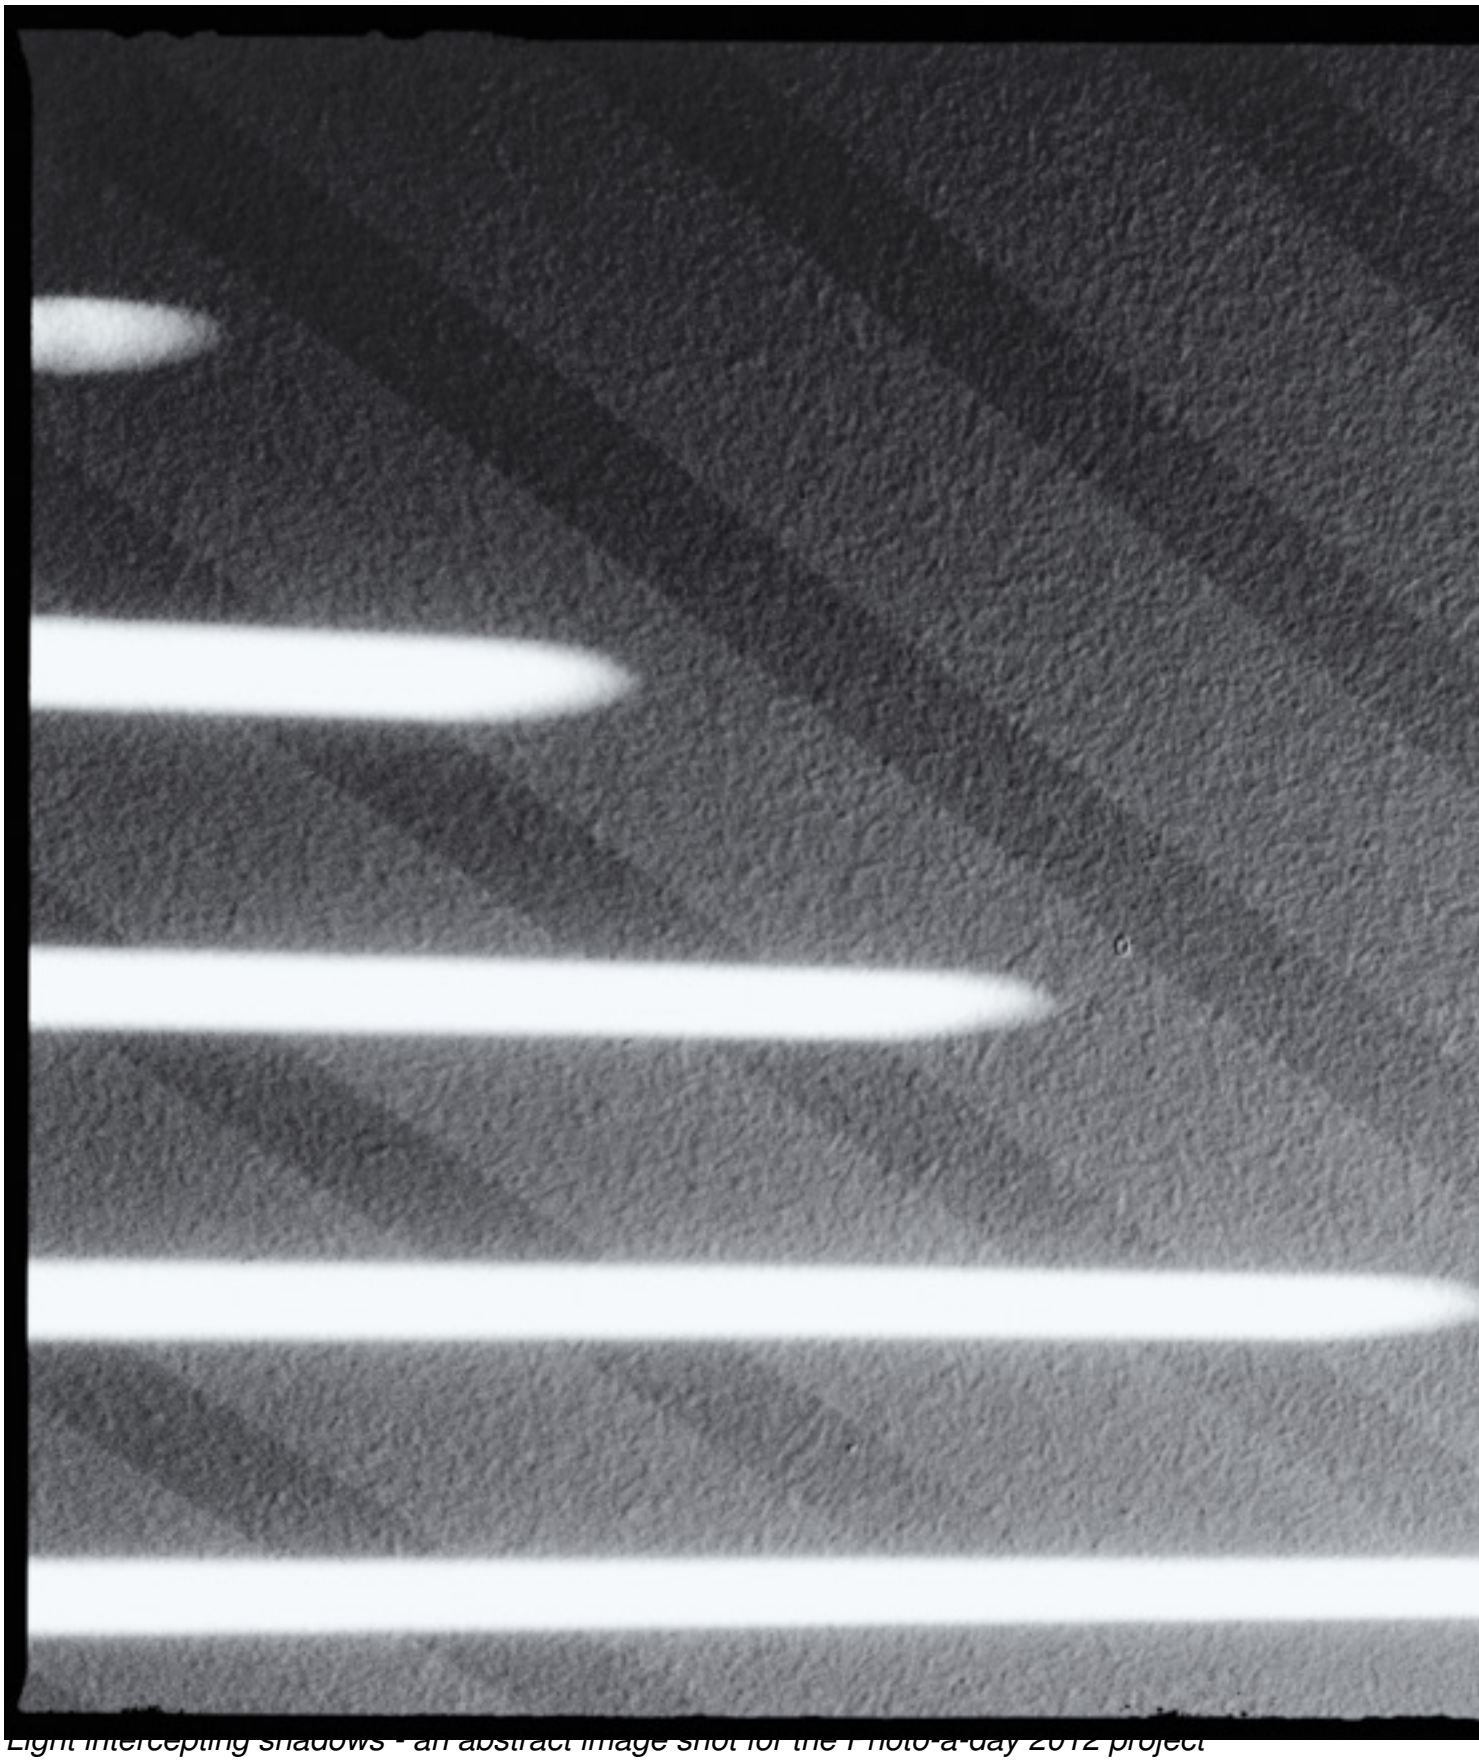

up

Flowers were part of Emma Kate's exhibition - Rêverie: stories of living life à la française

Light intercepting shadows - an abstract image shot for the Photo-a-day 2012 project

